Some opportunities for dynamic scheduling in distributed mathematical programming libraries

Jack Poulson[*1]

[1]Department of Mathematics [Stanford] – Stanford University, Department of Mathematics, building 380, Stanford, California 94305, United States

Abstract

Opportunities for improving upon current best-practice techniques for block synchronous distributed-memory parallelizations of (fixed and arbitrary-precision) dense and sparse-direct linear algebra, Interior Point Methods, and lattice reduction will be given from the perspective of pitfalls of MPI library development within Elemental.

[*]Speaker